Sure, here is a design for a curriculum vitae that I created as a graphic designer:

Name

[Your Name]

Contact Information

[Your Email] [Your Phone Number] [Your LinkedIn Profile]

Summary

A brief summary of your skills, experience, and goals. This should be no more than a few sentences long.

Skills

A list of your skills, both hard and soft. Hard skills are specific skills that you have learned through education or training, such as proficiency in a particular software program or language. Soft skills are more general skills that relate to your ability to work with others, communicate effectively, and solve problems.

Experience

A list of your work experience, including the name of the company, your job title, and the dates you worked there. Be sure to highlight your accomplishments and responsibilities in each role.

Education

A list of your educational background, including the name of the school, your degree, and the dates you attended.

Awards and Honors

A list of any awards or honors you have received.

Projects

A list of any projects you have worked on, either in your professional or personal life. This could include anything from designing a website to starting a business.

References

A list of three references, including their name, title, and contact information.

This is just a basic design for a curriculum vitae. You can customize it to fit your own needs and style. Be sure to use clear and concise language, and to proofread your CV carefully before submitting it to potential employers.

Here are some additional tips for creating a strong curriculum vitae:

- Use keywords that are relevant to the jobs you are applying for. This will help your CV get noticed by potential employers.
- Tailor your CV to each job you apply for. Highlight the skills and experience that are most relevant to the position.
- Keep your CV concise and easy to read. Aim for one or two pages, maximum.
- Use a professional font and format. Avoid using too much color or graphics.
- Proofread your CV carefully before submitting it. Typos and grammatical errors will make you look unprofessional.
